ANTIQUÉ GALLEY LOCKS, FOLIO SIZE

These wooden galley locks have a spring-loaded button at the end, you just push it against the wall of the galley to compress it and place the other end in. (We haven't figured out how they got the spring in there.) Nothing is known about the age or source of these rather rare historic items. Length is about 8³/₄". Due to shrinkage and/or variation in galley size, most of these will need a reglet or nonpariel shim between the button and the galley to get good compression. CC0198-00

PRINTER'S SEALING WAX

A standard traditional letterpress tool, used for securing gauge pins to the top sheet.

Okay, it's just regular sealing wax; nothing special about it for use by printers. But it has long been used by pressmen to secure gauge pins to the top sheet once they have been positioned to achieve perfect register: a few drops of hot wax dripped on them insures that they'll stay in that perfect spot. You don't need this if you use Adjustable Quad Guides or any other kind of pin that clamps to the tympan--and you don't really need it even if you use the old Megill's tympan-stabbing pins--but it's a historically significant printing artifact.

This stuff was in an old newspaper office in western Illinois that we cleared out some years ago. Best guess is that it dates to the 1930s or 40s. We're selling it by the box, and we have five (5) boxes of it. The photo is of the best box; many of the sticks are cracked or broken and a couple even have a little soot on the tip, proving that they were actually used in that shop. The fifth and final box to sell is one stick short and the price will be duly prorated. JB0402

The label reads:
